North Carolina Senate Race Remains a Toss Up

Raleigh, N.C. – PPP's first general election poll of the North Carolina Senate contest continues to find a very competitive race, with both candidates unpopular and many voters leaning toward a third party candidate as a result.

Kay Hagan leads Thom Tillis 38/36 with Libertarian candidate Sean Haugh pulling a surprisingly high 11%. Haugh's presence in the race has the potential to be a headache for Tillis moving forward if the contest remains this competitive- people planning to vote for him right now say they would support Tillis over Hagan 47/27 if they had to choose between the major party candidates. When you reallocate those folks the race is tied at 41%- usually a 2 point difference like that doesn't matter but given the closeness of this one it could.

Haugh's surprising support is likely the function of voters being pretty down on both of the major party candidates. Hagan has a 38/49 approval spread, pretty consistent with where her numbers have been since Republicans began running attack ads on her last fall. Tillis is at a 30/46 favorability spread, including only 51/23 with GOP voters. Despite his outright win last week some folks within his own party continue to be disaffected with him and are leaning toward voting Libertarian at least for now.

In a lot of the US Senate races that are competitive right now the undecided voters are strongly Republican leaning, suggesting that the races could break toward the GOP in the end. That's not the case here though- undecideds actually voted for Barack Obama by a 55/37 margin in 2012 and are pretty evenly split on his approval right now at 40/42. That makes it likely this race will remain within a couple points one way or the other moving forward.

“For the last six months now it’s looked like this will be one of the closest Senate races in the country,” said Dean Debnam, President of Public Policy Polling. “And the results of the primary didn’t change that- it’s unlikely either of these candidates will be able to end up pulling away by more than a few points. All eyes will be on North Carolina in the battle for control of the Senate.”

PPP surveyed 877 registered voters from May 9th to 11th. The margin of error for the survey is +/- 3.3%. 80% of interviews for the poll were conducted over the phone with 20% interviewed over the internet to reach respondents who don’t have landline telephones.
